Cameron Carter Question 4

I know during class we talked about the Facade pattern and how it essentially allows for encapsulation of subsystems for simplification of an interface and to hide complex objects from a client. However, if the system only consists of a few classes that are already easy to use, introducing a Facade can create more layers than needed. It may give the illusion of simplification while actually making the code harder to trace and debug.